

The Closing Framework

Three Stages. Ten Minutes. Signed Customer.

The Framework

Stage	Purpose	Time
Discovery	Find the pain, dig into it, build emotional weight.	3-4 min
Solution	Recap, confirm, drop the price, shut up.	3-4 min
Close	Collect info, handle objections, sign them up.	Rest

Quick, casual, controlled. The whole call should feel like a conversation with a buddy who knows cell phone plans, not a sales pitch.

Smoke screens: Not real. Don't address them. Don't argue. Just ask your next question.

Stage 1 • Discovery

This is where the sale is won or lost. Your job is to help the customer feel the weight of their current situation - not to gather information.

The Three Moves

1. Get them to question their loyalty. Why are they with their carrier? Usually it wasn't a choice - it was inertia.
2. Find pain and dig. Bill too high, dropping calls, old phones. Ask how long. Time amplifies pain.
3. Let the weight build. Mirror what they say, then go quiet. They'll fill the silence with the real answer.

Core Questions

Question	What It Does
"How long have you had [carrier]?"	Opens the door to: "What made you sign up with them?"
"What made you open to taking a look at this?"	Mirror their answer back and go quiet. The real pain comes next.
"How's your current setup working for you?"	Open-ended. Lets them direct where the pain is.
"Is it more the cost, coverage, or the phones?"	Forces them to prioritize their own pain.
"What kind of phones do you have? Still being financed?"	Situation info + surfaces pain (old/broken phones).

"How many lines do you have?"

Follow with: "And all of those are actually in use?"

Digging In - when they hand you a pain point, ask how long. That's it.

Them: "I've been dropping calls." → You: "How long has that been happening?"

Them: "I feel like I'm paying too much." → You: "How long have you felt that way?"

Stage 2 • Solution

If discovery was done right, this is quick. Four moves:

1. Recap the order. "Sounds like you need two new phones and three lines staying the same. That right?"
2. Micro-commitment. "If we could get you the newest phone at no cost, does that sound like a win?"
3. State the price. One number. No feature dumps. No breakdowns.
4. Shut up. Let them talk first. Answer their clarification simply. Move on.

Stage 3 • Close

Not a moment. A transition. Sound like you've been here before. Confidence transfers. Hesitation transfers. Pick one.

If they're uneasy - volunteer the catches before they ask:

"There are a couple catches: this is a promotional rate, you'll trade in your current phones for the free upgrades, and you keep all your same phone numbers - that's required. Are you good with all of that?"

Soft Closes - logistics questions that double as commitment tests

Question	What It Really Does
"Is the business address where you want phones shipped?"	Assumes they're ordering.
"Does she want the orange, silver, or deep blue?"	Picking colors = decided.
"What's a good email for you?"	Stealth close - you're collecting info now.
"Do you have the T-Mobile / Verizon app on your phone?"	Moves straight into the porting PIN - assumes the deal's done.

The Rules

- Ask more than you talk. Talking more than the customer = pitching. Them talking more = selling.
- Smoke screens aren't real. Ignore them. Next question.
- Price first, features never. One number. Let them react.

- Silence is a weapon. Mirror, then shut up.
- Be calm. Your energy is their energy.
- Ten minutes. Past fifteen without being in the close? Discovery failed.