

ADVANCED SETTER SCRIPT

Financial Pain Amplification + Scout Frame

◆ Opener (your preferred tone)

"Hi, this is [name] on a recorded line — I'm working with Verizon. Could you help me out for a quick second?" (wait)

◆ Clear Intent Frame

Make the purpose obvious but soft:

"Perfect — The reason for my call is that we've been helping homeowners lower their monthly internet bills."

(short pause)

"If it made sense, would you be opposed to a quick comparison?"

Optional Opener

Sometimes the vibe when they pick up calls for a more direct approach. If they sound busy or no-nonsense, skip the two-step and combine the opener + intent frame into one line:

"Hi, this is ____ on a recorded line. We've been helping homeowners lower their monthly internet bills — if it made sense, would you be opposed to a quick comparison?"

This gets you to the same place faster. Use it when they sound like they don't want small talk.

◆ Financial Discovery (amplify the pain)

This section has two parts. First you get two key numbers — speed and cost. Then you amplify. The amplifier questions are NOT a rigid script. They're a toolbox. Read the conversation, pick what fits, and let the prospect talk themselves into realizing they're overpaying.

Step 1 — Get the line count:

"Just so we don't waste your time — about how fast is your internet?"

(wait)

If needed:

"Ballpark is fine."

Step 2 — Get the monthly cost:

“And roughly what does the monthly bill usually run?”

(wait)

If they hesitate:

“No worries — a lot of people don’t check it every month. Does somewhere around $____ sound about right?”

Estimate based on their speed. If they correct you, great — you still got the number.

Step 3 — Amplify:

Now you have their numbers. This is where an advanced setter separates themselves. Your job is to make that monthly cost FEEL bigger than it sounded when they first said it. You do this by asking natural follow-up questions that add context — duration, trend, whether they’ve tried to fix it, etc.

You don’t need to ask all of these. Pick 2–3 that feel natural based on what they’ve told you so far:

➤ “How long have you been paying around that?”

Makes them realize how much they’ve spent over time. They’ll do the math on their own.

➤ “Did it start off at that amount, or has it kind of crept up over time?” Most bills go up. Getting them to say it out loud builds frustration.

➤ “Do you have streaming services bundled in with that, or is that just for the internet?”

If it’s just internet, the number suddenly feels a lot worse.

➤ “Does that include renting the equipment, or do you own your own router and modem?”

Separates device cost from service cost. Either answer gives you useful info for the closer. ➤

“Do you ever notice it slowing down when everybody’s home and using it at once?”

Plants the seed that consolidating could save money.

➤ “Have you ever called in to try and get them to bring that down at all?”

If no — they’re stuck and they know it. If yes and it didn’t work — even better.

The goal: by the time you’re done amplifying, the prospect should be thinking “yeah, that IS a lot.” You didn’t tell them that. They arrived there on their own.

Then — drop the comparison number:

Once you've amplified enough, pivot to the value. Keep it casual:

"Gotcha. So if the fiber option could give you a better overall value than what you're paying for now, you'd at least be open to seeing it — right?"

(let that number land — don't fill the silence)

THIS is the moment. The gap between what they're paying and what you just said does all the selling. You don't need to push. The number speaks for itself.

◆ Scout Frame + Risk Reversal

You're positioning yourself as low-stakes. You're not the closer, you're not asking them to switch — you're just the person who found them. This drops their guard completely.

"Gotcha. Well listen, I'm really just a scout here. This conversation is meant to be pretty surface level."

(pause — let that frame set)

"My job is just to find people who might be able to save a little bit of money with the service."

(pause)

"If it doesn't clearly beat what you have, you'd just stick with what you're doing — fair?"

(wait for yes)

Why this works: You've done three things at once — (1) lowered your authority so they don't feel pressured, (2) made the conversation feel like THEIR idea to continue, and (3) given them a guaranteed out. There's no reason to say no.

◆ Book the Appointment (assumptive)

"What's usually easier for you — mornings or afternoons?"

(wait)

Then:

"I've got ____ or ____ available — which works better?"

◆ Confirm + Anchor (reduce no-shows)

Don't just book and hang up. Anchor the appointment so it sticks:

"Perfect — I've got you down for [day] at [time]. You'll get a quick text confirmation from us."

(pause)

"The call usually takes about 10 minutes, and [rep name] is going to walk you through everything side-by-side. Sound good?"

(wait for confirmation)

If they sound unsure:

"Worst case, you see the numbers and decide it's not for you — at least you'll know for sure either way. Fair enough?"

?? VA REMINDERS

⚠ No pricing beyond the quick comparison number

⚠ No technical explanations

⚠ No persuasion battles — the numbers do the selling

⚠ Don't rush the amplifiers — each pause lets the pain compound ⚠

Don't skip the scout frame — it's what makes the close feel effortless ✓

One response per objection

✓ Always return to warm transfer → booking

✓ Confirm + anchor every appointment before hanging up
